An analysis was made of the results of treatment of 220 patients with aortic dissections who had undergone surgery in the period between 1977 and 1981. Temporary and persistent local hypocoagulation was observed in 62.5% of cases. The degree of the functional condition of the blood coagulation system was determined by the character of a dissection and by the dynamics of its clinical picture. Blood coagulation disorders were observed in 13.2% of patients with dissecting aneurysms and in 41.1% of those with dissections of the coronary artery. Heparinization and compression of the truncus in all surgical interventions and in 59.5% of medical interventions were an efficient method of preventing intraoperative and early postoperative hemorrhages. The frequency of the postoperative hemorrhages was equal in both surgical and medical methods of treatment. Thrombocytopenia was observed in 27% of cases. It was determined by severe concomitant diseases in 53.3% of cases and by the character of a dissection in 46.7% of cases. Prophylactic administration of heparin was effective in 75% of cases. The results of the treatment of patients with aortic dissection during the acute period did not differ in the groups of the patients with open and closed abdominal and thoracic dissection.
