This simple tool will help you to find unwanted processes running in the background. It is a tool, that will help you to identify processes that are used by programs, Windows and services to perform the work that your computer does. These processes are called "invisible processes". The tool is based on the principle of process list generation (Process Explorer). All programs and services generate a log file with a description of the work they do. To keep log files, all application developers, they are not forced to do anything special. To log the work, all programs use a special method, called the internal method. The method has been implemented in all Windows versions starting from Windows 95. The name of the file is always the same. The suffix of the file is the description of the work that it carries out. For example, if you use File Explorer, the file name is always explorer.exe+".log". The file is stored in the system folder, which is usually C:\Windows\System32. The most popular applications create the same files. For example, in a typical installation of Windows, there are several versions of explorer.exe. Each program will generate a different file. For example, explorer.exe.log, explorer.exe+".log", explorer.exe+".log.2",... The tool, which searches and identifies invisible processes, is aimed to determine which files contain the logs of the processes that are visible by Windows, and which are not. We have made our best to identify each log file and to determine if it contains the data about processes that are visible to Windows, and which are not. The tool searches for a list of common processes, that are not visible to Windows. What is common for all programs and services, and what makes the program that generates the logs of the invisible processes special? For the program developers, there are two problems: - Make the Windows information about the processes that they generate
