What's New in the Adobe Photoshop CS5?

Mature B lymphocytes are a small fraction of the circulating peripheral blood cells, accounting for 1% to 4% of the total lymphocyte population. Like lymphocytes of other lineages, B cells develop in the bone marrow and migrate to the spleen, the lymph nodes, and the peripheral blood as they mature. B cells recognize foreign proteins such as viruses and bacteria by their surface immunoglobulins. They are activated by antigens bound to the B cell surface immunoglobulin receptor. B cells are also known to recognize and kill cells that are deficient in major histocompatibility complex molecules, which are coded for by genes inherited from both parents. Excessive recognition of defective or abnormal cells is a problem that can be particularly serious in a subject infected with a retrovirus. This recognition of abnormal cells plays an important role in the development of autoimmunity.

Abnormal T cell recognition of one's own cells has been implicated in the pathogenesis of a number of autoimmune diseases, including diabetes, multiple sclerosis, and myasthenia gravis. B cells can be naturally activated to produce antibodies against a specific antigen by stimulating the B cell surface immunoglobulin receptor. This procedure, called activation, is carried out primarily by the binding of surface immunoglobulin M (IgM) to foreign antigen on accessory cells. The binding activates a tyrosine kinase, which, in turn, activates a secondary antigen-specific molecule (trigger factor) that eventually activates a protein called transcription factor NF- $\kappa$ B. When NFxcexaB is activated, it translocates to the nucleus where it can activate the production of target proteins that promote the B cell antibody response. Activation of NF-xcexaB in B cells can also be carried out by the binding of a specific antigen to its B cell receptor. This procedure is commonly called B cell receptor (BCR) stimulation. BCR stimulation also activates tyrosine kinase, which in turn activates a secondary antigen-specific molecule (trigger factor) that activates NF-xcexaB. However, BCR stimulation with an antibody to B cell surface immunoglobulin M (IgM) can prevent the BCR-mediated NF-xcexaB activation and subsequent B cell antibody response in B cells that are already activated, suggesting that the BCR signal and NF-xcexaB activation occur on different B cell surfaces. Further, it appears that the BCR signal does
