Papain-like proteinases have a widespread distribution in all kingdoms of life, and are found in bacteria, archaea, plants, fungi and animals. These enzymes have a low substrate specificity and are capable of cleaving a wide variety of protein substrates. To better understand their role in proteolytic processing of recombinant human interferon (IFN)-beta, we isolated and characterized the gene for a novel mammalian papain-like proteinase, which has not been previously identified. The complete nucleotide sequence is composed of a single exon, whose predicted protein (mPLP) contains the characteristic motifs of cysteine proteinases and a signal pept 5b5f913d15
