Two weeks ago, the Secret Service came under fire after arresting a Pennsylvania man outside of the White House for disorderly conduct. The man, Ronald Riggelman, had entered the White House grounds, which is against the law, and was trying to film the grounds. The arrest was filmed by a bystander. Riggleman, who is a law enforcement officer himself, was handcuffed and thrown in the back of a police cruiser. "He seemed very well-intentioned. He had his whole life planned out," said Jennifer Skenandore, who took the video. "He's a police officer. He said, 'Hey, hey, you guys are violating the constitution.' And he told us to take care of him." But the White House said he was a troublemaker. The Secret Service barred Riggleman from the White House grounds for life.

Skenandore is shocked that he was barred from the grounds, especially since he's a police officer and the arresting officers are police officers. "I feel like they just made a mistake," Skenandore said. "I think he should have gotten some sort of second chance to show them that they were wrong." But it's not over yet.

The Secret Service has not brought charges. And they're not saying why. "It's under review," said a Secret Service spokesperson. "I don't want to give anything away, but I would tell you there was a full review." The case will be sent to a federal prosecutor who will determine whether to bring charges or drop the case. Riggleman has a lawyer but there is no judge at this point. Once Riggleman makes his next court appearance, an interesting question will arise about his police
