In the general public sector, the State Rail Authority estimates that its annual cost to connect people with a quality-of-life package is between $1.2 and $1.3 billion. While costs vary by region, the average annual cost of connecting people with a 'quality of life package' ranges from $130,000 to $180,000 per household. This figure is significantly higher than the cost of providing affordable housing, which averages at $32,000 per household. The State Rail Authority estimates that approximately two million households would be required to be connected to a quality of life package in NSW. In June 2017, the United Nations Human Settlements Programme estimates that the total population of Australian households in urban areas is approximately 6.8 million people, or about one in every 20 people. This estimate does not include the additional 250,000 households in rural areas, which equates to one in every 30 people. In both urban and rural areas, it is the informal sector that is the major source of rental housing. The majority of the dwellings in urban informal settlements (estimated to be more than 25,000) are one bedroom rental units, which are estimated to accommodate an average of approximately six people, including children. The median rent for such units is about $280 per week, approximately 3.5 times the median rent for metropolitan affordable housing ($81 per week). In rural areas, about two-thirds of the residential dwellings are both one- and two-bedroom units. A survey of the rural rental market indicated that the median rent for a one bedroom unit in rural areas was about $200 per week. Government policy is not aligned with housing need in the formal rental sector
